university, according to Yates.

He said the agency is only required by law to inform parents of an alcohol violation if the offender is under the age of 18.

Though the parking lot is owned by the university, Regina Lawson, the chief of Campus Police, said that her department didn't know about the agents.

Ken Zick, the vice president of student life and instructional resources, said his office also had no knowledge of the operation by ALE.

"The Winston-Salem Police certainly, and ALE alone can choose to monitor any public event it wishes," Zick said.

Campus Police officers do not go out in uniform to write up students who violate the alcohol policy, Zick said.

He said that to his knowledge, the department has only used an undercover officer once this semester.

In that case, the officer was following up on an accusation that a fraternity was not using sign-in lists or carding guests.

Michael Kelly, the director of athletics operations, said that no one in the department of athletics knew of the officers until they saw them at the game and that they do not often patrol university games.

"They rarely have come out in years past," he said.

Kelly said the agents may have hit the lots because the game was on a weekday and not the usual weekend.

Leon Corbett, a vice president and the university counsel, said the university would not necessarily have to be informed of ALE's operation.

"They are a state agency and they have the authority to enforce the alcohol laws however and whenever," Corbett said.

Lawson said ALE's operation should remind students that underage drinking is illegal.

She said it might also help students take seriously President Thomas K. Hearn Jr.'s new statement on alcohol abuse, which was released to all undergraduate students last week.

"Every student has been made aware of the fact that the President feels strongly about students' abusive consumption of alcohol," Lawson said.

Lawson, however, denied any connection between ALE's presence at the stadium parking lot Thursday and Hearn's new policy on alcohol.

"I can assure you that a call did not go directly from the President's office to ALE," Lawson said.

The prospect of future operations by ALE at the parking lot is a possibility, according to Lawson.

"It's perfectly legitimate for it to happen again," she said.

appointment that includes helping the student discover why they drank so much and education about how to prevent similar incidents.

"We'd be remiss if we just said, 'Oh, we'll just take care of them while they're intoxicated,' and not take steps to follow up ... If they have a substance abuse problem we don't want to help them continue that," Price said.

If students repeatedly arrive at the health clinic with complications from intoxication, health service will take steps to see that the student receives some type of counseling. No administrative steps will be taken, however; the matter remains between the clinic and the student.

Health clinic officials are bound by confidentiality laws not to reveal information about patients to anyone. The people who accompany the sick student to the clinic are not patients and therefore are not protected by the confidentiality laws.

Clinic officials maintain a policy never to report students accompanying intoxicated people unless they are causing a disturbance.

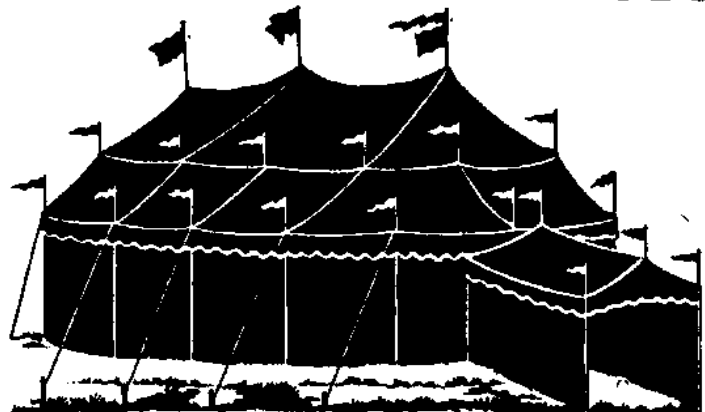

"Clearly, if other students are concerned about their friend, we want them to bring them in," Price said.

The only information released by the health clinic is general statistics given to university administrators each year. The report contains only numbers; it does not include names.
